RE: Comments concerning the Telephone Consumer Protection Act of 1991

Dear Sir or Madam:

Our firm is a home remodeling company based in St. Louis, Missouri, which has approximately one hundred twenty-five full and part-time employees. Our business is primarily derived from telephone advertising to consumers. There are thousands of small and mid-sized business like our's throughout the nation which use telephone advertising because it allows them to reach the market at low cost. Obviously, consumers are receptive to this type of advertising or it would not be a viable and increasingly popular form of advertising.

Since our business depends on telephone advertising, we have our own interests at stake. There is, however, a much broader and more important issue at hand, which is the economic distress that could be wrought by restrictions on an activity as pervasive as telephone advertising. There may very well not be accurate statistics to reflect the true magnitude of telephone advertising in this country since it is used by so many small businesses which are not represented by industry associations or lobbying groups. The home remodeling industry to which we belong, for instance, has sales of over one hundred billion dollars per year and almost all contracting firms of any size rely on telephone advertising for the majority of their business.

There are over three hundred thousand people employed as telemarketers in this county. If telemarketing is significantly curtailed the direct loss of jobs would be huge, while the indirect loss of jobs would cause an economic upheaval. In our industry, carpenters, salespeople, bookkeepers, receptionists, etc. would all lose their jobs due to a decline in business.

It is important to note that for many small, service-oriented businesses, there is no form of advertising that can be cost effectively substituted for telephone advertising. Businesses such as small home repair services, insurance agencies, real estate companies and many others cannot afford more expensive forms of advertising such as TV or newspaper. Telephone advertising allows them to reach a local market at a cost they can afford and their very existence depends on it.

For consumers who object to all types of phone solicitation, there is already a mechanism to prevent it, since every telephone service subscriber currently has the option of choosing an unlisted number. The expense and inconvenience of doing so are small compared to the expense and inconvenience that would be generated by an extensive database effort.

There is a positive side to telephone advertising. Our firm maintains an internal "do not call" list, and for every complaint we receive, we have over one hundred happy customers who were advised of our services by phone.

Based on our experience with telephone advertising, we offer the following observations:

Automatic dialing and announcing devices

Auto dialing systems using pre-recorded messages require low investment and create a nuisance that is disproportionate to their economic significance. These systems usually dial sequentially meaning that they dial unlisted numbers and other inappropriate numbers without discrimination. There would be little economic consequence to eliminating this form of advertising.

Established business relationship

The TCPA states that telephone solicitation does not include a call to any person with whom the caller has an established business relationship. Defining what is meant by "established business relationship" could be confusing. By way of example, in our business we often call prospects with whom we've talked before, even though they have not purchased anything. In many cases we have made extended presentations to these prospects. Would we be considered to have a relationship with these prospects?

Many companies use advertising that utilizes reply postcards so that an interested party may request information. These reply cards commonly request the interested party's phone number so that the business may follow-up by phone. When this type of advertising is placed in mass circulation via newspaper or mail, a certain percentage of these reply cards are completed by pranksters who list random individuals as interested parties. When these individuals are called by the business, the business could be accused of uninvited solicitation.

Indeed, any company using reply card advertising or telemarketing would be vulnerable to disgruntled ex-employees or competitors. These ex-employees or competitors could send numerous reply cards to a company with the name and phone number of randomly selected consumers, which the company would then solicit. It is even conceivable that one unhappy ex-employee could pretend to telemarket in the name of his ex-employer and generate a large number of apparent violations.

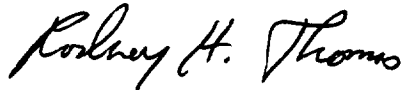

The above scenarios are extreme examples, but interference with an economic force as massive as telephone advertising is certain to have many unexpected consequences.

Internal "do not call" lists

Any responsible company should maintain a list of consumers who have asked the company not to call them. This is only good business. This method of self-policing would have the advantage of allowing consumers to restrict those particular businesses which they consider abusive or bothersome, while still receiving calls from businesses they may be interested in.

Our firm is very much in the trenches of telemarketing. We would appreciate the opportunity to furnish further information or testimony about why telephone advertising is a vital component of our economy with benefits that outweigh detriments and satisfied recipients who greatly outnumber complainants.

Sincerely,

RE: Petition concerning the Telephone Consumer Protection Act

Dear Sir or Madam:

Last week I had occasion to talk to the owners of two different remodeling companies about the regulatory situation with regard to telemarketing. These gentlemen had been unaware of this legislation and suggested that we circulate a petition around all three companies (their's and mine).

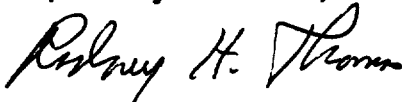

We did this and it is attached.

Please forgive us if a petition is not appropriate in comments such as these. We just want to let you know how serious the repercussions of the restrictions suggested by the TCPA could be.

This petition is not the result of a highly organized effort. It resulted from a chance encounter between three local business owners in one specific industry. There are thousands of similar businesses in many different industries.

Thank you very much for your attention.

Respectfully submitted,

Rodney H. Thomas
President
